

2005. 03 B

Institute in Gardens heals infants' misshapen heads

Regarding the article "Head shape common flaw in newborns" (March 23): The methods described in the article are cruel and painful to children. In Palm Beach Gardens is the Upledger Institute, which teaches craniosacral therapy, and pediatric craniosacral therapy is known around the world. This is an approved method that can release the skull bone and allow it to heal itself without terrible pain.

I have three grandsons from two daughters, all born by Caesarean section. All three had misshapen heads; all three went to the Upledger Institute, and in one session, their heads were round and the pressure relieved, right before my son-in-law's eyes. May I suggest that if The Post runs articles like this that the editors conduct thorough research.

ANDREA OLNEY
Wellington